MARKET COMMENTARY

In December, the listed infrastructure sector lagged broader global equity markets amid continued vaccine-driven recovery optimism. For ALI, this was accentuated by another very strong month for the A$, up 4% to US$0.77, following a gain of 6% in November. ALI's portfolio manager, Cohen & Steers, again outperformed our benchmark, but in the short-term the infrastructure sector remains relatively out of favour, compared to technology stocks in particular.

Within infrastructure, it was the more economically sensitive subsectors which performed best, such as marine ports (+7.4%), railways (+2.8%) and airports (+1.8%). Electric and gas utilities were generally flat over the month, although we note that US renewables are expected to benefit from Democrat policies.

The communications subsector pulled back -2.9%, as investors favoured recovery stocks over pandemic beneficiaries. This area of infrastructure includes data centres and satellites, but in terms of market capitalisation is dominated by large global telecommunications tower companies. Excellent long-term structural fundamentals, including ever-increasing wireless data demand and data storage requirements, were already providing these companies with strong growth prior to COVID-19, and these trends have been accelerated by social distancing requirements and working and learning from home. ALI retains an overweight exposure to this dynamic.
