Structural tailwinds in supply and demand expected to support strong copper prices

Robust Construction demand led by China

China accounts for ~50% of global demand for copper with strong tailwinds due to expected increasing urbanisation, investments in transportation and power networks, and strong manufacturing

Transition to renewable energy sources

Offshore wind (10x), Onshore wind (4x) and Solar (4x) all use significantly more copper per MW of energy production than conventional sources

Electric Vehicle Uptake

Plug-in Hybrid Electric Vehicles and Battery Electric Vehicles are estimated to require 2.6 times and 3.6 times (respectively) the copper used in internal combustion engine cars with total sales expected to triple by 2025

Declining Mill Grade

Average global copper mill grade reduction from 3.5% to <1.0% in last 25 years

Increasing Capital Intensity

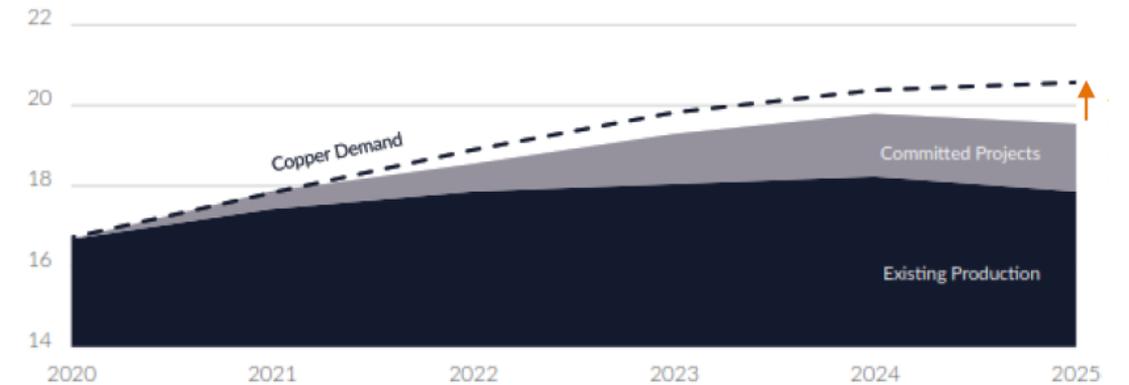

Higher capital required to bring new production online due to increased depth of orebodies, technical and metallurgical complexity, lower grade of orebodies and water scarcity

Declining Discovery Rates

Only 2 major discoveries since 2015 despite average annual exploration spend of US$1.9bn

Mined copper supply vs mined copper demand balance, kt

Additional copper supply required from new sources with increasing gap to demand emerging post 2025
