Company commentary

- US bank holdings impacted by the fallout from Silicon Valley Bank collapse
- Apollo's stock price over-reaction to US financial market conditions provides an opportunity

Our US bank holdings were negatively impacted by the collapse of Silicon Valley Bank and Signature Bank which sparked fear amongst investors and led to broad-based selling of the sector. The difference between Silicon Valley and the likes of Bank of America, our primary holding in the sector, is in their deposit franchise. Silicon Valley Bank was dominated by large deposits from young technology companies facing an increasingly difficult funding environment post pandemic and thus withdrawing deposits, whereas Bank of America's deposit holders are generally current account holders with relatively small balances. We used the sharp sell off in Bank of America's share price to increase our position over the month.

Apollo Global Management also retreated over the month (-10.9%), albeit at one stage it was down over 20% as the market worried about annuity withdrawals from its Athene business. Ultimately, we believe this is an over-reaction due to the vast majority of Athene's annuities having built in protections against early withdrawals which results in a very stable funding base. We used the intra month volatility in Apollo's stock price to buy back call options we had previously sold, crystallising gains and giving us full exposure to the upside going forward.
