

First Licence Secured for HyEnergy Green Hydrogen Project

- Section 91 Licence granted over Town Common land near Carnarvon
- Approval allows environmental and other on-ground project studies to commence on site which covers almost 100 sq km
- Province is working with Traditional Owners, Western Australian Government, and Pastoralists on further land access approvals

Province Resources has secured the first of its approvals for its HyEnergy green hydrogen project, with a licence granted for a site north of Carnarvon.

The section 91 licence under the Land Administration Act allows the Company to begin environmental and other on-ground studies on site to support a broader feasibility study for the project.

The licence covers a 98.6 sq km site north of Carnarvon, known as the Town Common. It is planned to be the production site of the HyEnergy Project, as well as home to some upstream generation assets. Province is progressing discussions with the State Government and the Shire of Carnarvon on a long-term lease of the area.

Discussions are also underway with the State Government, Traditional Owners, and Pastoralists over a broader area of the Gascoyne Region to support large-scale wind and solar generation assets.

The fully-developed green hydrogen project would have a capacity of up to approximately 8GW, although an initial phase may be developed with a smaller capacity.

Province Resources Managing Director David Frances said that while the Section 91 licence was only a preliminary step in overall approvals required for the project, it was exciting to begin some activities on site.

"This approval allows us to get on the ground to commence our environmental, heritage, geo technical and other survey work," Mr Frances said.

"It means we get can get a better understanding of the physical properties of the location to support our concept selection process.

"We are looking forward to being on site in the coming weeks to begin this important work."

This announcement has been approved by the Board.
