The Studio's features are highlighted by its use of innovative HoloMAX 3D technology, a unique three-dimensional and holographic retail experience for design professionals and consumers. The HoloMAX technology is employed in the Studio's 'Dream Room,' which uses multiple projectors to allow designers and their clients to design a room by adding home décor and furnishings selected from Kabuni's product catalogue. Hundreds of different home décor items and furnishings can be visualised in the HoloMAX as 3D holograms. The designer can move and place these items in the room with the tap of a finger. This immersive experience provides the client with the ability to visualise the designers ideas before ordering products, and represents a major innovation in interior design.

The Studio also incorporates revolutionary 'Touch Tables' and a 'Touch Wall,' both products from interactive hardware specialist Ideum. These large multi-touch devices allow for up to 60 simultaneous touch points, creating massive collaboration tools and introducing entirely new mediums for designers to interact with their clients.

"The most exciting thing about the Kabuni Community Design Studio is the opportunity to access a state-of-the-art space for collaboration," stated Vancouver-based interior designer Courtyney Molyneaux, one of Kabuni's Brand Ambassadors. "A lot of things in design are a collaborative effort, and it's amazing that designers will be given a space to do just that, whether it is with clients or fellow designers. Kabuni's Studio sets itself apart with technology. There are so many resources you can use to present and show off your ideas. I think the Dream Room has to be my favourite element at the studio. I've never seen or used anything like it."

“We’re thrilled at the potential of our first Community Design Studio,” stated Neil Patel, Kabuni’s founder and CEO. “At the heart of Kabuni’s vision is improving the fashion in which designers interact with their clients. It’s important that this effort extends beyond the on-line realm, and into a more personal, face-to-face arena. The Design Studio allows us to do just that, without sacrificing our passion for innovation.”
