Kabuni's web platform will provide designers with many of the same tools offered by the Company's mobile application. Both interior designers and clients utilize the platform to create 'Inspiration Boards,' curated selections of images that represent their particular aesthetic or home design vision. Designers and clients with similar styles are then matched together in order to facilitate collaboration on a given project.

The initial version of Kabuni's web platform offers all of these features – users can create Inspiration Boards, matching to designers or clients, and both follow and communicate with their favourite users. Furthermore, the 'Design Stream' feature provides users with a suggested selection of images intended to fuel their design aspirations. The web platform is also accessible via any mobile browser. As a result, users on all mobile operating systems – including Blackberry, Windows, and Android devices – will now be able to experience Kabuni for the first time.

Kabuni anticipates adding complete e-commerce features to the web platform during the third quarter of 2016. These features, which allow designers to generate income via sales processed through Kabuni, were introduced in the most recent version of the Company's mobile application. Kabuni processed its first sale on March 31, 2016.

"Kabuni's web platform will serve as a vital complement to our mobile application," stated Neil Patel, the Company's founder and CEO. "While the future of the web is undoubtedly mobile, the vast majority of today's online sales transactions are conducted via a computer. The continued development of our web platform will allow us to provide our offerings on not only their desktop or laptop, but also from any mobile device, regardless of operating system. As we begin to process sales and record our first revenues, we look forward to reinvesting in the continued development of our services."
